Such a Curse: A Messianic Look at Purim by Mark Stover | Jan 1, 1993

Purim is the Jewish holiday which is most carnival-like. Children drown out Haman's name with groggers. Young Jewish girls participate in Queen Esther beauty pageants. Plays are enacted called Purimspiels. And everyone nashes on poppyseed and prune hamantaschen. Yet, behind the feasting and drinking and partying lies a somber message: the near destruction of the Jewish people. It reminds us that Jewish survival hangs by a thread of circumstance—but the weight on the matter is in God's hand. The account in the book of Esther takes place in fifth century Persia. And the events and characters of Purim (court intrigue, dramatic confrontations, heroes, and villains) are no joking matter. They could be elements in a melodrama plot: Esther, a beautiful Jewish teenager, becomes queen of Persia. Haman, an ambitious and arrogant bureaucrat, turns his envy of the Jew, Mordecai, into a vendetta against the entire Jewish population of Persia.

Mordecai, who is Esther's cousin, appeals to her for help and she cautiously agrees to approach the king. However, she has kept her religious and ethnic identity a secret. After hosting two banquets for the king and Haman, Esther reveals her Jewish identity, and in the presence of the king she tells of Haman's treachery. His plot to destroy the Jewish people is exposed and Haman and his sons are taken away and executed. Mordecai then becomes prime minister and is honored. Esther remains queen. And the Jewish people are spared from extermination.

This Purim, we might also consider the claims of the Yeshua whose very name actually means "salvation." He offers life and peace to all, both Jews and gentiles, who trust in his name. And all who follow Yeshua, according to the New Covenant, will have their own names written in the book of life, where they can never be blotted out. (Revelation 3:5)
